

ABSTRACT

5 A method for growing crystals comprises removing solvent from a first plurality of solutions of a compound simultaneously and at substantially the same rate, to form a solid; and removing solvent from a second plurality of solutions of the compound simultaneously and at different rates, to form a solid. The first plurality of solutions contain different concentrations of the compound, and the second plurality of solutions contain substantially the same concentration of the compound.